LATIN AMERICAN CINEMA
By Stephen M. Hart

Stephen Hart, Professor of Hispanic Studies at University College London, coined the phrase ‘slick grit’ in 2006 when he delivered a paper in London on the ‘dynamics of contemporary Latin American Cinemas’ as part of a symposium on the transnational in Latin American and Iberian cinemas. At that point, he was using the term as a means to unravel and articulate the reason for the phenomenal box office success of turn-of-millennium films such as Fernando Meirelles’s Cidade de Deus (City of God) and Alejandro González Iñárritu’s Amores perros (Love’s a Bitch), which he argued had ‘opened up a dialogue’ with Hollywood to transform the face of Latin American films, resulting in worldwide critical acclaim and commercial success.

In his latest book, simply titled Latin American Cinema, Hart returns to the term ‘slick grit’ to describe one of three identifiable periods for Latin American cinema since World War Two, at which point film production in the region began to move beyond the stop-start activity of previous decades and to develop a distinctive identity and infrastructure. He suggests that these three fundamental stages are: the New Latin American Cinema (1951–75), influenced by Italian neorealism; the “nation-image” era (1976–99), which recorded the brutal military regimes of the time; and the “slick grit” period (2000–2014), when the withdrawal of state subsidies forced directors to seek commercial success without compromising artistic and political ambition.

This mapping is in itself an ambitious task, given that the terrain of any regional cinema is so vast and there is always the danger of glossing over the many different routes and approaches to film-making. And yet in just 215 pages, Hart manages to give a tightly argued, persuasive and comprehensive account of Latin American cinema from its origins in 1896 to the present day, while also offering fresh perspectives on landmark films, film-makers and movements. With 120 stills (in black and white and colour) to support close textual analysis of films that span the entire period under review and include Black God, White Devil (1964), The Official Version (1984), Central Station (1998), Amores Perros (2000), City of God (2002), Babel (2006) and Gravity (2013), this text goes beyond mere survey and succeeds in making original connections between major historical connections, theoretical developments and important cinematic moments.

I was particularly drawn to the section which focuses on New Latin American cinema (1951-1975) and the Deleuzian concept of the Time Image and which includes a particularly lively analysis of Gutiérrez Alea’s seminal Memories of Underdevelopment (1968), which Hart argues is innovative not just for its revolutionary political force but also for its innovations in film language. For Hart, this film was distinctive in that it ‘embodied revolution in both its use of media and in its politics’ (48), drawing together form and content for a common purpose. In his careful analysis, he shows in detail how the Cuban protagonist’s experience embodies the Time-Image conundrum, with a disconnection from time and space that leads to a series of unsettling encounters interspersed with images of the past that create a startling ‘algebra of memory’ (54).

The key thread binding all these sections is the ‘hunch’ (borne out of Hart’s own experiences teaching documentary film-making in Cuba) that while attention to historical and political contexts remains crucial, a fresh focus on the changes in film technology – from hand-held camera in the 1950s to the digital turn at the end of the 1990s – is needed. Likewise, he insists on an acknowledgement, following Lev Kuleshov, that a blend of theory and practice on all levels is fundamental to a comprehensive understanding of the way that film works. Hart’s text therefore is written from the perspective of a film historian/theorist/maker who seeks to understand the ‘major paradigm shifts’ that have been brought about by new cinema technologies.

Academically rigorous, meticulously illustrated and very accessible, Latin American Cinema offers a fresh perspective on the history of the cinema of a vast and diverse region that acknowledges the challenge of taking on such a complex task.

Dr Sarah Barrow is Head of School and teaches film at the University of Lincoln

[670 words]